

I thought I should mention that about pedegogy. I have felt that the Lord has blessed us in the realm of pedegogy. I felt right from the start that our seminary-- that is of Faith, and here, I have felt the Lord has enabled us to have a higher level of pedegogy than any school I've ever had anything to do with either as a student or as a teacher. It's not been our judgment and selection, it's been the Lord's blessing in helping us.

Neher: Somebody could conceivably write better Introduction books than have yet been written, by trying to undertake that task that you mentioned of taking Wilson's fine arguments and correlating them with clear presentations of the critical theory. Could something like that still be done?

MacRae: It might still be done. The big problem is that to publish a book costs a lot of money. The publishers find that there is not interest in this particular thing. As you say that would have to be done. To take the Christians and show them the strength of the critical arguments-- most of them don't feel like bothering and to take themodernists and show them the foolishness of the critical arguments, they think that's nonsense. If somebody would write up a book that would really handle this well, and then have $5000 into having it printed and then have another $5000 to put into advertizingit, he might do a great deal of good. But the publishers-- Francis Schaeffer said to me 2 years ago that the publishers are only interested in making money and that includes Christian publishers too! That's what he said. The publishers have to put a big investment for a book, and then after they publish a bood they have to decide what they are going to advertize. I think, for instance, my GOSPEL OF ISAIAH, would sell two or three times as many copies as it has sold if it was advertized.

I meet people who are tremendously interested in Isaiah. And who are interested in me, who have never heard of the book!
