

I think it is quite sure to have a result. I did I believe it had with me as I said, when I finished Occidental, the Lord has given me a skeptical attitude ~~which~~ which led me not to accept the conclusions they gave but perhaps if I'd been out trying to convert them I'd been more ready to accept them in the end! Instead of ^{tremendously} taht I sat back and listened. But my confidence was so/shaken, It is just the mercy of the Lord that I came through. I would not recommend to anybody else to get that kind of training.

They told us when I was in Princeton, there were two brothers, one of whom went to Princeton Seminary and one who went to Union Seminary. The one that went to Princeton Seminary came out a liberal and the one who went to Union came out a conservative. I forget the names of both of them now. Both became rather -- fairly well-known for a while. My observation was that the one who went to Union and came out conservative, he reaction against some of the extreme teachings at Union. So compared to the average Union graduate he was quite conservative. But he was a very unintelligent conservative. He didn't understand much from a truly Biblical viewpoint. The one who went to Princeton and came out a liberal, the same way, he reacted against it. So he was liberal but nothing like what he would have been if he'd gone to Union.

I used to think you could divide people into about 90% of people accept what they are given with no questions. And that perhaps another ~~22~~ 8% react violently ~~with~~ against whatever they are given. Then there is maybe 2% who really think about things. So we would really train more effective Christian workers if we simply said, Here's like Bob Jones does, Heee's the truth; take it. But I feel that~~x~~ if we can train a few who can really think and can really apply the Bible to new situations as they develop, that in
