

And he recovered from his illness and lived for a good many years after that. But before the pilgrims left to go back, Massasoit called to him ~~one of the~~ an Indian who was with them, who was translating for the pilgrims and he said, I would like to say a word to you ~~he said~~ privately. So the Indian came and he talked with him a little bit, and then the Indian went back with them. Now as they went back, what the Indian told them was this: that shortly after the pilgrims came, in fact the next year, another boat came in from England ~~bringing~~ bringing an entirely different group of people and this boat settled just off of Plymouth and asked the Pilgrims ~~(?)~~ ^{Indians} to take care of these folks a little while while they looked around for a place to settle. And the Pilgrims only barely had enough food to get them through the summer till the harvest would come so it was a very great inconvenience to them but they did it, and then these people left them and went to a place about 30 miles north of them which they picked out for their homes, and they settled down there but they were a rather worthless lot of men who were idle and did very little and soon came into difficult circumstances, and then they began stealing from the Indians, and some of them sold whatever they had. They sold all their clothes to the Indians for food, they were practically naked and they were in dire straits and stealing so much from the Indians that this tribe of Indians up there sent word to Massasoit and they said, These people up here in this town are so wicked, ~~so miserable, they said,~~ that we've got to get rid of them, ^{but} and if we ^{do} ~~get rid of them~~ those other English people down there whom you say are entirely different will not stand for it if we murder them, so the only safe thing for us to do is to kill all the English in this area at one time, and so they ~~w~~ said we want to get several tribes to suddenly have an uprising and to attack all these people and kill them all. And when the pilgrims helped Massasoit recover from his illness at this time, he told them about this and the result was that when they got back to Plymouth and told them about it, Capt. Miles Standish and a small group of men went North to the place where this group of Indians were that were planning to kill these other Englishmen, attacked them, killed their ring-leaders, stopped this attack right at the start and the result was that the uprising did not go any further. But the very next year down in Virginia, there was a sudden Indian uprising in which nearly 350 of the people were killed, and every single one of the colonists in Va. would have been killed if it were not that that an Indian convert there had passed on
