

certainly won't work for the next tooth the next day. It is something which in most cases would certainly be definitely harmful. I would think in most cases would be definitely wrong. On the other hand if a person has had a broken arm and the arm has been ~~broken~~ set and it has been in a cast for quite a time, I'm told that when you take the cast off of it there are apt to be adhesions which have to be broken and that it is rather painful to do that. It is done with a quick snap and the arm has to be relaxed to do it. In such a case the doctor will talk to the person and get their mind off it and get them to thinking that he is not going to do anything that will hurt them and then all of a sudden just snap it and it is done. Get them relaxed ~~xxx~~ by deceiving them but the deception is certainly not wrong for them to tell them that it isn't going to hurt or to tell them they are not going to feel it, would be I would think a lie that would be at least highly questionably. But to distract their attention which is certainly giving a false impression is something that no one would question in such a case. So there is a definite line there. I think that there is a deception which is a concealment by telling part of the truth or by evading the question and that deception of this type becomes right or wrong depending on the motive. It becomes right or wrong ~~xxx~~ depending on the situation. Certainly if someone tries to force you to tell them something that is none of their affairs by tricking you into it and asking you questions that they had no right to ask you certainly you have an absolute right to conceal from them the matter which it is not their right to know. I think that a minister gets into very difficult moral problems on this view inevitably because any minister who is dealing as an advisor and helper with people is bound to have situations where people tell him matters in confidence--tell him matters which it is very helpful for him to know and which he can help them and advise them if he knows, but which he certainly should not reveal to other people. In such a case other people will ask questions and will try to learn from him facts which it is not his place to tell them. In such a case it is rather difficult to know just how to answer.
