Whom the the spirit (18). Joshua had long been associated with Moses (Ex.xvil. 9-14, xxiv.13, xxxil.11; Nu.xi.28). He vas one of the two faithful spies (xiii.16, xiv. $6,30,38$ ). What a foy it must have been to Moses, then God appointed as his suceessor that one vho had been his right-hand man so long! Moses did not seek. this dignity for his own sons, but left the decision entirely in God's hand. Few men with the abilfty to be great leaders have the humility to occupy a second place as Joshua did for so many years, and to serve a loag apprenticespip before themselves taking comand. Few mon comparable in power to Moses are able to work with a man of like calibre under them, without ruining the subordinate's individuaiity. The relationship does much honour both to Moses and to Joshua, as does the great record of accomplishment by Joshua after Moses' death. While Moseg was still Ilving, Joshua was installed as his successor (20-23), thus fh ensuring against any misunderstanding or uncertainty at Moses' death.

The command in verse 12 does not state how soon it is to be carried out. In this case several weeks intervened before the command was executed. Moses proceeded to do the work described in the remzining chapters of Numbers, and to give the great farevell addresses contained in the book of Deuteronomy. At their conclusion, God repeated the command, together with His judgment on Moses' sin (Dt. xxxi1.48-52). It is not unusual in the Bible for a command to be given some tine before it is intended to be carried out (cf. 1 Ki.xix.15-16 with 2 Ki. vifi. 13 and $1 x .5-6$ ). Some critics claim that Dt. xxxif.48-52 and Nu. xxvif.12-14 1 are varfant accounts of the same thing. However, there is nothing unreasonable in the Lord repeating the conmand in amplified form when the time came to carry it out. The material from here to the end of Deuteronomy reads continuously and there is no legitimate reason for breaking it up and parcelling it among various documents.
