He said it promoted loyalty (8.), he said that actually there ~~was~~ no harm in it, it was a good thing and it was good for every viewpoint for the country, that these exercises produced a zealous and able ministry and he ~~reminded the Queen~~ reminded the Queen she was only mortal. He said, "Although you are mighty, yet remember that He which dwelleth in Heaven is mightier". He said that he could not stop these exercises, he couldn't with conscience have allowed the offense to the majesty of God destroy such an edifying institution. For months the struggle went on - finally in May 1577 the Queen herself sent out letters to the bishops ordering the

She said they promoted idleness and disorder. In June the Archbishop was confined to his house, sequestered there for six months in 1577. They of removing him as Archbishop. They didn't like the thought of the inevitable scandal and consequent comfort to the Roman families that might bring, there were many people who admired greatly the Archbishop of Canterbury and felt he was entirely right in what he was doing, they simply kept him there in his house where he couldn't do anything and had subordinates do the work. And finally they persuaded him to present a resignation. And he formally offered a resignation but before the terms could be arranged, he died. And so now Elizabeth sought out a minister who she was sure was not sympathetic with the but who was sympathetic with a church which would, while keeping Protestant views on the main points, would give great attention to form and ceremony and to uniformity and to giving the Queen her rightful place as the supreme governor - that what she said was right instead of spending time arguing among themselves as to what the Bible said.

Mr. Dunn? (Student question) GRINDAL. He is very little known in English history but he is a man of real Christian character and conviction. He's little known because he didn't accomplish much you see. He came at a point where Elizabeth's way was winning, he resisted perhaps for five or six years but he'd have been put out of the way and she'd have gone on. As it was he died and didn't have to be put out of the way. Now she got a man who would be thoroughly in line with what she wanted. So we had a
